Timekeeping Authority Says Length of Day is Changing

Length of the day, the mean period of the earth's rotation, is changing in two ways, Sir Harold Spencer Jones, astronomer royal of Great Britain, explains.

One change, he says, is well known and well understood. It amounts to about one thousandth of a second a century, sufficient to upset seriously some astronomical calculations. The change is due to the drag of tides over the beaches of shallow seas. This change also affects the day-length of the moon.

The other change, equally minute, is in calculable and unpredictable. Sometimes it hastens and sometimes slows down the earth's rotation.

The change could be accounted for quantitatively if the earth expanded or contracted slightly by four or five inches. "The data," says the astronomer royal, who is considered the world's chief authority on timekeeping, "are not sufficiently accurate to decide fully or whether they are spread over a few days, a few weeks, a few months, or even over a year or two."

The evidence provided by the observations and calculations of the displacement of large atmospheric masses, with a corresponding change in the moment of inertia.

Fading in Showcase

Because of the somewhat limited range of colors available in dyes that are quite fast, manufacturers often use others which fade more easily, in order to give the variety of colors demanded by the public. Fading is produced principally by the same range of energy as that used by our eyes, so when a showcase is well lighted, the articles prominent, they may fade if left there for a long time. Of course, they would fade even more quickly in daylight, where the intensity of the light is much greater. In general, if the articles are changed and shifted frequently enough so that none is close to the lamp and receives the high intensity for more than a week, little fading will be experienced.

Cause of Ice Caves

Ice caves are ordinary caves in which ice is present both in winter and summer. The water from rain, all finds its way into the ground and is frozen. Since caves generally are most abundant in limestone, they may occur in any area where there are caves. Those most favorable for accumulation of ice have poor circulation of air in the summer, which keeps the ice from melting or evaporating. The lowest and innermost parts of the caves, where the cool, dense air settles and where the warming rays of the sun cannot reach, are those where the ice will form and remain.
